THE problem of thieves taking lead from churches might seem like something from the pages of a Charles Dickens novel, but Duval Security know that it is still a very real problem.

In fact many historic buildings and isolated properties are at risk, but thwarting the thieves has in the past proved difficult.

Now, however, Duval have produced an innovative camera solution tailored for buildings where there are no telephone lines or even mains electricity.

Modern mobile technology means that if an intruder enters an area which is under surveillance by Duval's security camera system their control room will be instantly alerted and a snapshot of the incident will flash up on the control room monitors.

A Duval patrol unit can then be sent out, or the police or other designated person contacted.

The system has already been successfully fitted in Derby and Nottinghamshire, and Duval are now hoping that other churches and commercial properties will be able to take advantage of this new technology in and around the Lancashire area.

The device is vandal-proof and can operate under extreme conditions.

A spokesperson for Duval Security said: "Theft is an ever-increasing area of concern to all, and especially ancient and historic buildings, and our instant reaction to any intrusion will help to give peace of mind to all concerned with the security and preservation of our heritage."

The company has more than 30 years' experience in the security industry, and all staff are handpicked and hold official SIA licences.
